

Moses And The Half-Blood President

The organization and governance of any sizeable group of people must be based on simple rules that are easily understood so there is no excuse for breaking them. That avoids one being able to claim that they were confused and didn't understand the rules since the rules were confusing. An early historical example is that of Moses and the 10 commandments given on Mount Sinai. They were short and simple and clear. Anyone hearing them would understand them without the need of a scribe (or lawyer) to explain the nuances of the words and phrases.

All fundamental law since time immemorial has followed the principle seen in that example, including our own United States Constitution of Government. It was written to be concise, not verbose; simple, not complex; crystal clear, not ambiguous. It wasn't enough to just write the document, it had to be easily understood by the literate and illiterate alike because they all were going to have to make a choice as to whether or not they would accept it, ratify it, and thereby make it the fundamental law by which they, and all others, would have to abide for the rest of their lives.

The simplicity and clarity of the Constitution laid out the skeleton of the government. The flesh would be added later by the Congress in conformity to the skeleton. Building and administering a government around the wording of the Constitution required that everyone fully understand it. That universal understanding was not muddied by uncertainty here and ambiguity there. Its meaning was not confusing, vague, or open to various interpretations (with the exceptions of vaguely defined powers such as the power to tax -having no limits placed on it, and promoting the general welfare).

But otherwise there was no confusing language. The only uncertainty resulted from what was not written, -from the details that were missing and had yet to be fleshed out. One example would be the elements of eligibility of the Vice-President. The fact was overlooked that in order to replace an incapacitated President, the VP would have to fulfill the presidential eligibility requirements. [That oversight was later corrected via an amendment.]

The point of explaining this is to refute the contention that one of those requirements wasn't exactly clear. In fact, it is contended that it is downright confusing, vague, and probably ambiguous. It is contended that only the Supreme Court can interpret and explain the true meaning of the words of the Constitution regarding who is eligible to be President, -when that is false. The true meaning is evident to anyone with a brain, just as it was when those words were written, read, ratified and adopted. They were crystal clear when written, easily understood by all, and it is only our distant modern ignorance and bias that prevent the universal acknowledgement of their meaning.

To which words do I refer? These: Article 2, Section 1, Clause 5: NO PERSON,...except a natural born Citizen, shall be eligible to the Office of the President..."

It is strongly in the interest of a particular political party in American politics to distort, confuse, obfuscate, and dilute the meaning of the words; "natural born". Everyone understands the meaning of "citizen" but if everyone understood the meaning of "natural" and "born", then a certain sitting President would be found to be illegitimate. That is a conclusion that the establishment cannot allow because it would result in a constitutional crisis like this nation has never seen and probably would never see again. But in defense of the truth, let's examine the facts as they existed when the Constitution was written, -as well as throughout all of human history.

The meaning of "natural" and "born" are derived from natural law. They are so closely related that together they create a sort of reinforced redundancy. The meaning of natural is uncontested, but dishonest minds have worked to completely twist the meaning of "born" thereby creating confusion and an impression of ambiguity. Their goal is to convince all that "born" and "birth" are somehow synonymous with geography, namely national boundaries, and the magical power of being born within them. They do this by using false logic. The concept they push is that anyone, by simply being "born in the United States", is automatically a citizen "by birth", -reardless of the fact that there is no basis in American law nor logic to support that claim, -and in fact, there is a long history, both administrative and constitutional, that counters and refutes that claim.

The falseness of their logic is exposed by untwisting the concept that by being a citizen at or upon birth, one is therefore a citizen by birth. Reality is understood by looking at what is natural. One is not a human being merely at birth, but is a human being "by birth" to human parents. Being human does not begin at birth but at conception. One is human by nature, not by the event of birth nor the location of birth. This relates to the two types of citizenship connected to birth.

One is natural, the other is artificial, otherwise known as statutory citizenship, which was upgraded by the 14th Amendment into constitutional citizenship. Artificial citizenship is dependent upon the laws passed by Congress as naturalization statutes and the 14th Amendment, and their interpretation by the Supreme Court. But natural citizenship is not dependent on any law ever written because Congress was not granted any authority by the Constitution to regulate or legislate in regard to that which is a natural human right. Rather, we are endowed by our Creator with an unalienable right to our own children and they have a natural right of membership in the family/clan/tribe or nation of which their parents are members.

There's a principle that pertains to children born to foreigners. In many countries, (the U.S. included,) such children are only considered to be members of the nation where they are born if their parents are immigrants and not mere visitors or diplomats. By law they are considered to be converted (naturalized) from the foreign citizenship of their father and/or mother into domestic citizenship and that automatic naturalization begins at birth. They are natural-ized citizens from/at/ upon birth, but they are not natural citizens because they were born to foreigners. If foreign parents first become naturalized, then their children will be natural American citizens because they would be born to citizens and not foreigners.

Now let's look at the word "natural". In every group, whether family, clan, tribe, or nation, the most fundamental element of group association is that of identification. Is one an enemy or a friendly? Is one a member or a non-member? Is one a natural member or an adopted member? One's status is determined by the answer to these questions. Natural membership in the group is the result of being born into the group. No persons who were not born to group members will ever be describable as natural members. What is true in a family sense, is also true in a tribal and national sense. Outsiders become members by adoption. The group leaders agree to adopt outsiders into the group and allow them all the privileges of natural members except one, and that is that they cannot be permitted to assume the office of the Chief, King, Czar, or Pharaoh. That is a responsibility reserved solely for natural members because their allegiance to the group is unquestionable.

The case of Moses is instructive. He, as a Hebrew baby in the land of Egypt, had a death sentence on his head so his mother left him where Pharaoh's daughter would find him. She did, and adopted him. He became a son of the Pharaoh and a Prince of Egypt, but was he a natural son? Of course not. If the Pharaoh had secretly been his father and a Hebrew woman his mother, would he be (a.) a natural Egyptian or (b.) something else? He would be something else because his genealogy wouldn't spring from only Egyptian sources but from mixed sources. No Egyptian aristocrat would accept a half-blood prince inheriting the throne of the Pharaohs. To be Pharaoh one would have to be not just a prince but also a natural Egyptian.

But what if the daughter of the Pharaoh was impregnated by an outsider, perhaps a Hebrew, and gave birth to a son? What will his status be? It depends on how they choose to deal with him. They can kill him, or they can adopt him. Whatever they choose, the result is one that is determined by human choice and not by nature. If he is adopted, his adoption into group membership is by permission, not by nature. He would be an adopted member, not a natural member because he was not begotten by a father who is a member. Only members can pro-create natural members, natural natives, and natural citizens. Outside males cannot pro-create natives or natural citizens.

Consider the example of artificial fertilization. If a woman is married to a King who is sterile and she therefore resorts to achieving pregnancy via another man's sperm, is the off-spring truly the King's seed and of his blood-line? Certainly not. Such a son would be a half-blood heir but only from a legal perspective. If later, the King becomes potent and impregnates his wife, the child will be his full-blood heir. Which will the King choose to inherit his throne? The half-blood first born or the full-blood son born later? He would choose the full-blood son because he is his natural off-spring and carries his blood-line. One is fully natural while the other is artificial, or half-blood. The same natural principle applies to citizenship.

The citizenship that is natural is never half-blood. Rather, it's always full-blood. Any mixture of another bloodline/group membership/nationality results in an off-spring that is accepted by the principle of adoption, not natural creation. The fact that such an adoption is from birth does not make one a natural member, it only makes one a life-long member with all the privileges of membership except one, -ascent to the Throne. Or in the case of the United States, -the Presidency, which also includes the position of the Commander-in-Chief.

In 2008 the Constitution of the United States was ignored like it didn't even exist. All the powers-that-be remained silent lest they be accused of racism for attempting to lawfully block the first mixed race candidate from attaining the American dream. Now it is too late for them to say what they knew or suspected because they would look like the cowards that they are. So we as a nation are riding on a giant train that is no longer rolling on the tracks of constitutional restraints because we have been bamboozled into thinking that everyone couldn't get it wrong, and especially not get it wrong on purpose. But that is exactly what has happened.

Congress is either stupid or complicit because the Senate passed a resolution declaring that John McCain is a natural born citizen of the United States because he was born to American parents. They got that right by a vote of 99-0, but what of his fellow Senator and presidential opponent who was not born to American parents but was instead a "half-blood" statutory citizen? They and everyone else remained silent as he was illegitimately certified by the Democrat Party leadership to be a presidential candidate in all 50 states -with the exception of Hawaii because they had no evidence that he was born in the United States. But after secret talks with the authority that blocked the ballot certification, suddenly it became OK. The fix was in and it was in big time.

And now we will soon be witness to a repeat of this deliberate deceitful travesty against the Constitution and rule of law as he is again certified to be eligible in all 50 states because all of the systems of our society and government have been slowly but surely infiltrated for over 100 years by the enemies of the Constitution and the principles on which our nation was founded.

They can't get their way via constitutional amendment so instead they resort to simple majority legislation, supreme court decision, and by totally ignoring any fundamental law that impedes their goal of creating a centrally planned and controlled benevolent utopia of sheep who obediently follow the wise orders of their masters, -the elites, the academic and professional class that knows for certain that it is superior to the masses and far more capable of wisely making all the decisions for them. "The issue today is the same as it has been throughout all history, whether man shall be allowed to govern himself or be ruled by a small elite." --Thomas Jefferson

Welcome to the impending future. -the paradise of a Democratic Marxist Autocracy.

In this Bizarro world, the American people have ignorantly elected the man that spoke with a greatest stentorian voice that dispensed glowing platitudes even though he's constitutionally barred from serving as President. Superficiality and self-interest are what gets people elected in contests that in the end boil down to a beauty contest. Obama was more attractive than McCain and promised more. Words matter, but ones voice and appearance matter perhaps as much or more. Would Barack Obama now be President if his voice was similar to Barney Fife's voice? One will win any contest in which personal appeal and big promises are combined into one nice big package of idealistic Hope and Change.

Why shouldn't such a candidate be allowed to win? Why should it matter? Well, why should the rule of law matter? Why should the Constitution matter? Why should fidelity to the foundations of our government matter? If you are concerned that they should be then you should also be concerned that he isn't what he's supposed to be. He isn't a natural American. He's an adopted, "half-blood", hybrid, naturalized American and he isn't even that if he was born abroad, -in Kenya or Vancouver, because his mother was too young when he was born to convey citizenship to him if born abroad.

So we had an attractive, unvetted affirmative action candidate with Marxist friends, supported through college by the parents of the Weatherman Underground terrorist Bill Ayers, an embracer of radical Communist Black Liberation racial bigots, with a black hole where a public background should be, legitimized by a Certification of Live Birth that is nothing more than a counterfeit digital image on a computer screen and can never be authenticated by anyone because it doesn't exist as a real paper document.

And instead of being a natural American citizen with only Americans for parents, he is the off-spring of a foreign outsider, the product of two different continents, countries, empires, societies, and nationalities. But all in all he's a pretty nice guy anyway. He just wants to bring "Social Justice" to America, which means he wants to take more of what you've earned and give it to other people who haven't earned it and haven't even earned anything due to all of the possible various reasons, -including reasons of major character defects such as laziness and self-indulgence.

It's great that America could field and accept and embrace the first multi-racial candidate for the highest office in the nation. Diversity can be a good thing, [but it is not a natural thing. Just ask the Japanese if they would prefer that the natural uniformity of their island nation be disturbed by the unnatural chaotic diversity of the unassimilated Islamic population of say London or Paris.] What is not a good thing is that it took place in a totally illegitimate and unconstitutional manner with dirty politics and the complicity of silence attending it.

But even with the politically correct American lip-service toward diversity, no outsider's son is permitted to become Chief. No half-blood prince is permitted to become King, and "NO PERSON, except...a natural born citizen, shall be eligible to the Office of the President" -nor wield the power of the Commander-in-Chief.
