

President Obama Needs To Be Outed

President Obama lives a closeted life, wears a front to mask his enormous secret, maintains a public lie to defend his reputation and presidency, has a hidden truth that no one dare speak. What is that hidden truth? It is that he is a closet statutory citizen and not a "natural born citizens" as the Constitution requires in order to be President.

Some secrets are too devastating to be shared, too shocking to be disseminated, too disruptive and damaging to be broadcast. One such secret was that kept by Rock Hudson and all who knew him. When it was finally reveal in the press that he had AIDS, I wasn't shocked one bit. Why?

Because decades earlier, while still a teenage in the 1960s, my uncle, a resident of Hollywood, once related that while he was at a Hollywood party, he saw Rock Hudson, super male heart throb, kissing a man on the mouth. That sure went against the grain of what one would have expected to hear. But why did no one else hear about it? And not for decades?

Because of a wall of silence maintained by the press in order to protect one of America's idols. The news that a handsome, strong leading all-male American figure could be "queer" was more than any news operation was willing to divulge to the American people. There was an actual real-life, honest-to-goodness conspiracy of silence to protect him, (and us) from the truth.

We still live in the same world with the same motivations, only today the man being protected is not a superstar actor, but the President of the United States. He's being protected from the public knowing the truth about him. He must be kept in the closet so no one is aware that he is constitutionally barred from serving as the President.

The silence not only protects him, it also protects all those complicit in his election and those backing his secret agenda to further socialize America because by maintaining the appearance of eligibility, their interests are protected for as long as he remains in the White House.

This situation is analogous to that of how the press treated Magic Johnson when he suddenly resigned from his role as one of the most popular basketball players on Earth. If, before that event, sports reporters were aware through word-of-mouth that he had some unknown illness that might end his career, none of them would have questioned him about it because he was so well liked. They were all in his corner and rooting for him.

So it would have been unthinkable for one of them brazenly and disrespectfully to publicly demand to know what the truth was about his status. To ask; "Is it true that you have a serious unreported illness?" would have been analogous to a leftist reporter asking B. Obama; "Is it true that there are serious questions about your birth certificate and citizenship?"

They would not have asked Magic that question because it would have been impolite, -been something that no one else would want to hear, and a question to which no one would have desired to know the answer.

Even more out of the question would have been asking MJ; "Is it true that you have HIV, and if so, then how did you contract it?" Just asking that question would have ended the career of any sports reporter on Earth because he would have become a pariah in everyone's eyes.

Similarly, today we face the situation of no reporter daring to ask the question to which they do not want to know the answer, namely; "Mr. President, Mr. Obama,...Senator, is there any truth to the contention that you knowingly and willfully assumed the office of the President without being constitutionally qualified to be President?" "Is your entire presidency illegitimate, conceived outside of the sacred bond of constitutional fidelity, and born in bastard illegitimacy?" "Would you care to address that issue if you have the time?"

Don't bet your lunch money that such questions will ever be asked of him while he is the most powerful politician in the free world because those who could do the asking don't want to expose him to such questioning, -nor to know the answer. But someone needs to ask him, to expose him as the statutory citizen that he is, rather than the natural citizen that he is required to be. Someone needs to out him.

Donald Trump gave hints that there might be a secret that Obama doesn't want anyone to know, such as the very real likelihood that he was born outside of the United States and therefore was not even a U.S. citizen at birth because his mother was several months too young to legally convey citizenship to him.

Sheriff Joe Arpaio has gone considerably farther, something quite the opposite from what he expected when he accepted the job to investigate his birth certificate images, his Social Security number, and his Selective Service registration. The government hacks in control of public records refuse to cooperate with him and supply the records they're keeping secret, some of which have mysteriously been found to be "missing". He and his volunteer posse did their best before a room full of reporters to reveal their shocking findings, but what was the response of the press? To question him and remain silent about his findings. They were determined to keep Obama in the closet. And so far they have succeeded.

But there is an underground word-of-mouth type means of spreading rumor, gossip, facts, and truths to Americans far and wide. It of course is the wonder known as the internet and you're probably taking advantage of it right now. People can't remain entirely in the closet because even though you can fool all of the people some of the time, and some of the people all of the time, you can't fool all of the people all of the time.

But every major website of news and journalism has sure tried to, with only a few exceptions. Were it not for sites like YouTube, and WorldNet-Daily, the hidden truth about Obama's birth certificates and citizenship would probably be as arcane as theories about ancient aliens and Bigfoot. But the funny thing about reality is that it is as likely to be what you don't expect as to be what you do expect, as evidenced by a sighting and reporting of a Bigfoot just a block or two from my own backyard. (I live in the county where the Bigfoot footage was shot)

When or if you see something out of the blue, something that is totally unexpected and shocking, do you protect your reputation for level-headed credibility by remaining silent, or do you report the truth? The main-stream-media has chosen the former. Or it is perhaps more likely that they are just plain old ignorant. That is perfectly understandable. What is not understandable is their dogged determination to assert their opinion as if they know what they are talking about when they don't.

Why are they so determined? Why do they not have questions that might make them want to look behind the curtain? Why are they seemingly devoid of normal curiosity? One possible explanation is "group-think", maintained by peer pressure, and fear of being the nail-head that sticks up and therefore gets hammered.

But it is definitely not all about fear, it's also about affection for the usurper-in-chief. What's not to like about a cool, affable, powerful personality? They bask in its radiant glow. It's vitamin D for their socialist souls. It makes their socialist bones that much stronger. Why in the world would they be expected to "out" their messianic Achilles?

They won't do it because some secrets are best kept in the closet, -like JFK's young intern's secret sexual relationship with him that wasn't revealed for 50 years. But secrets can only be kept by those who know them. Those who don't are supporting their President by not learning the constitutional truth about his citizenship, -by not asking the questions normal curiosity asks. You may never hear them asked in public in your lifetime, -at least not by anyone in a position of authority or celebrity or media significance.

But since ignorance is bliss, they are contented to maintain the bliss of not knowing (or sharing) the truth about their closeted, un-outed President. It's that their great and powerful Achilles has a weak spot, a fact which he is keeping in the closet. But the thing about secrets is that when enough people aren't willing to doze-off, tranquilized into sleep by the wall of silence, then Achilles will eventually suffer an arrow through his vulnerable heel. When and if that finally happens, Look Out! because the you-know-what is going to hit the fan.
